About the Great Plains LID Symposium 2019

The Great Plains Research and Innovation Symposium (GPRIS) was created to expose decision-makers, professional designers, developers, citizens and others to the full range of regional LID practices available today. Attendees can then return to their communities and encourage the adoption of LID principles through public education, necessary changes in zoning codes to improve LID utilization, and technical support for their successful implementation relative to regional soils and climatic challenges. The GPRIS strives to foster creativity in sustainable development, wider understanding and acceptance of LID within the regulatory structure that guides development, and broader acceptance of interdisciplinary design approaches that are critical to successful LID implementation.

The 2019 Symposium will take place at Colorado State University. Colorado State University has longstanding research, education, and training programs in natural resources management. CSU is committed to its sustainability efforts. The conference will take place at the CSU Mountain Campus in the newly remodeled Lory Student Center, conveniently located close to historic Old Town with easy access to public transportation, bicycle rentals and the Cache la Poudre River.
